

The dog had three things going for him: courage, a deep understanding of his friend's deepest needs, and the ability to do it all once or twice as often as he needed to. He was the best of friends, the best of dogs, the best of everything. He was the best of everything.

